The Regency era, marked by the rule of the Prince Regent George IV, witnessed a significant shift in men's fashion. Tailored tailcoats became increasingly popular, typically in dark shades such as navy, green, and black. These tailcoats featured high waistlines and flared skirts, often adorned with intricate embroidery or metal buttons. Waistcoats, or vests, played a crucial role, adding color and style to the ensemble. They were typically cut low and featured lapels or a collar. Breeches, which extended just below the knee, complemented the tailcoats, while Hessian boots or pumps completed the formal look.
